THIS IS UNEVALUATED INFORMATION

25X1

As of mid-July 1952 Chinese Communist ground force strength was as follows:

1. The regular national defense forces have a total of 2,976,000 men. The forces comprise 2,350,000 infantry troops organized into four field armies with 23 army groups, 1 70 armies and 210 divisions; 140,000 organized into 14 cavalry divisions; 160,000 organized into 16 artillery divisions; 2 80,000 organized into 8 armored divisions; and 246,000 specialized troops (engineers, chemical warfare, railway units, etc.) organized into 82 regiments.
2. Military district troops total 1,944,000 men, organized into 29 replacement training or independent divisions; 288 garrison, police or independent regiments; 3 and 1,580 battalions.
3. Public security troops total 500,000 men organized into 76 divisions. 4
4. Militia units total 13,486,000 men.

Comment. The information, which represents statistics available to the Revolutionary Military Council, approximate manpower figures are Comment. Both troop and unit figures given above are considerably higher than those in estimates available to this office. A notable omission is mention of the North China Field Forces. The figures appear to belong to a paper organization instead of to actual data on these forces: i.e., 10,000 troops to a division (whether cavalry, artillery, or armored); 3,000 to a regiment; 70 armies, 210 divisions. This makes the total number of troops also a paper figure.

25X1 [redacted] Comment. Other reports have indicated the abolishment of some of the 20 army groups now carried in available estimates.

25X1 [redacted] Comment. The artillery units include anti-aircraft units for military districts.

25X1 [redacted] Comment. The figure of 288 includes regiments of some brigades (1u = 2464) in the East China Military Area; each brigade has three regiments.

25X1 [redacted] Comment. It is believed that public security forces are a police force subordinate to the Ministry of Public Security and should not be included in this military estimate.
